Hello. We are Kyo and Mori, two six-year-old boys (but not brothers!) who need a new home because our owners are moving to Japan and will be living in housing that does not accept cats (not even cats with Japanese names, alas).

Kyo is very loving and playful and also very independent - not a clingy dude - with a bit of an alpha male demeanor. He's okay with me (Mori) because I'm adorable and because I am a big Maine Coon mix who weighs 19 pounds, but would probably not get along well with other cats (or dogs or young children) as he does like to be the boss. He cracks me up when he sits on ledges and posts around the house and thinks he's so much taller than everybody else. As his best friend for six years, I am probably biased, but I think he's got a fascinating personality and would make a great match with someone who likes their cats to have a little character. He loves chasing things around the house, and when he's happy, he kneads. He also likes scratching posts and is careful to use them and not people's furniture or belongings.

Now I, Mori, am more of a sweet lap cat kinda guy - especially if you like your lap cats on the hefty side. I can be a little shy at first, but get along with everybody and would truly be content to just sit in or by a lap all day. I also enjoy scratching posts, comfy pillows, and lying on socks. I have a feline urinary track disorder, but I'm fine as long as I have my special food. Otherwise, I'm extremely low maintenance - even my long hair doesn't need a lot of brushing. I'd be okay with other kitties that are mellow like me, but probably not with dogs. It would be great if I could be adopted with my buddy Kyo, as we get along so well and are used to each other. Oh, and I almost forgot: when I'm especially happy, I flop over on my back with my paws curled and purr like crazy. I sure hope Kyo and I get to do that in a new home soon, and I know my owners would appreciate it as well because they really love us.
